HOW TO SELECT A FLATMATE

With your phone ringing and messages filling up your e-mail box, are you still trying to decide how to select your new flatmate? Here's some advice which may be useful.

4.1. ____

Choosing your ideal flatmate is a difficult task so it is a good idea to break it down into a few steps. Then you don't have to worry about everything at the same time and it allows you to concentrate on each bit individually.

4.2. ____

To start with, you need to limit the number of candidates to about ten names. To do so, you will have to decide on 4 or 5 things you would like to ask people about when you call them. This way you can find out more about each person and decide if you want to meet them or not.

4.3. ____

Write a list of people who you would like to see and invite them for an interview. When arranging interviews, it's smart to meet with potential flatmates a few hours apart, so that you don't have to stop talking to someone because the next candidate is waiting.

4.4. ____

Flatmate interviews are usually informal and can be held at different locations. It is advisable to meet outside your flat. For example, you could hold interviews in a local café or a shopping centre. Another option is taking a walk in the park.

4.5. ____

If you already share a flat with other people, you will need to find out how they feel about the person and select a new flatmate together. You can do this by comparing each candidate to the profile of the perfect flatmate you've all agreed on.

4.6. ____

Even when you have chosen the best candidate, don't give the answer right away. Tell the person you will ring them the following day. If you still feel confident about your choice in the morning, it's a sign the choice was right.

4.7. ____

If possible, ask people who study or work with your potential flatmate for an opinion. They can tell you in what situations it might be difficult to get on with this person and what he or she is like. In this way you can discover any hidden surprises.

THE ITALIAN EXPERIENCE

It was Sue's nineteenth birthday and she was in Italy on a gap year, working as an au pair. She'd been in Florence for six months and now she felt at home in the city. She had arrived totally frustrated by not knowing a single word of Italian, not even the words for "yes" and "no". Now Sue could communicate quite well. Instead of immediately guessing, "You're English, aren't you?" people said, "You're not from around here, are you?" She was very proud of that difference.

It was her first birthday away from home. Back in England, her birthdays were almost a routine. Her family woke her with a strong tea and presents and in the afternoon she met up with some friends in town. But after a few months here, the few letters she'd had from her friends about parties and who was going out with whom had made them seem less, rather than more, real. This day, her nineteenth birthday, started with a cup of delicious Italian coffee. She read the birthday card one of her friends had sent her by email, but there was nothing special about it. And suddenly Niccolo, the three-year-old she looked after, ran into her room and presented her with a colourful picture of some long-tailed creatures. He had drawn it himself. "How sweet of him," she thought. She hadn't expected a present like that.

When Sue started to look after Niccolo, he was a very naughty child. He screamed and cried if he didn't get what he wanted. There were lots of things he didn't eat and items of clothing he refused to wear. He was also terrified of water, so he didn't want to take a bath. Sue looked at him and realized that the boy was just like she used to be when she was three years old. Back then water was something scary for her too. And she also hated clothes that fitted too tightly and had to be pulled over her head. At that moment she understood how the boy felt, and immediately wanted to help him but didn't quite know how.

And then one week later, when Niccolo's parents went away on business, she had an idea. When he ran after her into the bathroom where she was filling the bath with water, she didn't ask him to get in it. Instead she played with the water, ignoring him. Keeping his eyes on her, he played too. In the end he asked her if he could get in. She didn't answer at once, pretending she was thinking about it, then agreed. Sue did the same with food. She didn't force him to eat, but she ate one sandwich after another in front of him. He looked at her hungrily while she told him stories about children who weren't afraid of anything. As he listened to the stories, he picked up his sandwich and began to eat. Sue pretended not to notice. He finished his plate. When Niccolo's parents returned, they were surprised to find him completely different from what he used to be like.

AN AMAZING COLLECTION

In everyday life, the paths of footballer Pele and artist Pablo Picasso never crossed. The pair were united, however, in a unique collection of autographs which has recently been sold at auction for £75,000. The collection includes 40,000 signatures which were gathered for over 50 years by Tommy Scullion.

Tommy was one of ten children in a family who lived in Northern Ireland. He began his hobby when he was at school. Tommy never married and worked all his life as a van driver for the local grocer's. He knew everyone and enjoyed speaking to people. In his spare time he wrote to celebrities – on average about 25 letters a week.

Tommy Scullion was an enthusiastic reader of the news and made lists of famous people he wanted to contact. But he needed their addresses, which wasn't easy. Remember, there was no Internet when he started collecting the autographs, so if he didn't know where somebody was, he wrote to an embassy. He was very determined and if somebody did not reply, he wrote to them over and over again. Some replied years after he had written to them, others didn't reply at all. Sometimes people are not willing to give their signatures for free, but Tommy never had to pay for the autographs. And from time to time he even received something extra with the autograph, for example a Christmas card from Grace Kelly or a drawing from Pablo Picasso.

Tommy got the signatures by writing personal letters to the celebrities. He even taught himself calligraphy to surprise those he wrote to, hoping that beautiful calligraphy would encourage them to reply. And it worked! A large number of the celebrities wrote back congratulating him on his beautifully written letters. In this way, he built up one of the world's finest collections of autographs.

His collection is like a history of the 20th century. It includes Pope John Paul II's autograph as well as US Senator Robert Kennedy's. Among the most valuable signatures is that of the famous Scottish biologist, Alexander Fleming, who discovered penicillin. Sometimes Tommy had to act like a detective to get an autograph. It was very difficult to trace Martin Luther King, but Tommy somehow managed to include his signature in the collection. In a few cases he wasn't so successful. In spite of his efforts and several letters sent to Buckingham Palace, he never got a reply from Queen Elizabeth II who, as a rule, doesn't give autographs. Tommy died in 1996 but signatures, including that of a South African president, continued coming to Northern Ireland after his death.

Despite the big names in his collection, Tommy did not put the signatures in any albums and he did not hang them on walls in picture frames. He wrote to these people, got their autographs back in the post, opened the envelopes and took them out. They ended up in boxes, before being put in a wardrobe. He sometimes tried to catalogue them but never finished the job.

In his will Tommy wrote that he wanted people to see his collection. There wasn't any museum in the village, so Tommy's brother decided to put some of the autographs up for auction and raise the money necessary to buy a building in which the collection could be displayed. Thanks to the auction Tommy's family are going to buy a building next to the doctor's surgery and transform it into a museum. £75,000 will help to fulfill Tommy's dream.
